However, during the timeline of My Friend Dahmer, The Bank was a high end jazz club; the punkish logo seen on the T-shirt came later. However, when I watched this movie, I went on a less violent, but just as emotionally wrangling version of the brilliant Henry: Portrait of a Serial Killer, heavily based on Henry Lee Lucas.My Friend Dahmer comes to the story of Jeffrey Dahmer from an interesting angle: it follows Dahmer growing up at school, following 17 years old until his first murder at 18 - the film stops just after picking up Steven Hicks. The story as written by John Backderf, played by Alex Wolff in the film, follows him and his various friends as they both invite Dahmer into their group to use him in various pranks but also try and be kind to him - or as kindly as you can be around an associative, seemingly asexual outcast that falsely attacks to get attention. The film has certain advantages that I have I say raise it above the bar from simply good to great. First is the cinematography first class; there's so much boldness and colorfulness that it associates much more with an upcoming film - the sharpness of colors reminds me a lot of The Spectacular Now, and that type of look helps the movie have a groundedness to it and almost makes you forget you're watching a film about one of the most notorious serial killers in history. The script is full of very interesting scenarios about both the characters and the town we grow up in. You get to see the individual disintegration of the lives of both Dahmer's parents, who are brilliantly realized by both Dallas Roberts and Anne Heche, you get to see the conflicting dynamic between Derf and his friends about their treatment of Jeffrey and how their entire lives are currently going off course. The cast is strong - small, and full of small parts that still stick with you. Alex Wolff is kind of nerdishly charming as John Backderf, who sees what he and his friends do as harmless fun and looks like Dahmer, really. There is a recurring role of a doctor played by Vincent Kartheiser who started fantasizing Dahmer about, played with a normalcy that makes the role stand out. BY A MILE, the best part of this move is Ross Lynch as the young Jeffrey Dahmer. The thing that makes this performance as Dahmer so interesting is that he's not an overly awkward, nerdy, introverted guy at the start of the film - he's just someone who has problems but isn't bad overall. However, as the film goes on, you see this man growing ever more dangerous on himself, and the few good qualities leave him at overtime - his willingness to make people laugh, his academic interests, and even his acceptance of Derf's drawings for him are completely gone over the course of the film. I won't say the film made me feel sad for him, but more despair is watching someone get more and more lost than anything else. From his graduation towards the end of the film, when he was literally left completely alone by his family, just left with a bottle of Vodka, the film's tone shifts from entertaining to soulless, and it's a tone that Ross Lynch fully embraces, through an incredibly tense scene with Derf, to the brilliant final scene where he picks up hitchhiker Steven Hicks. , it shook me very emotionally. I really liked this film, a lot. It shows a huge showcase of acting from Ross Lynch, who looks more than capable of shedding his Disney Channel image, and also Marc Meyers for directing such good material.
